TAP™ into the future of pain relief

Physicians and health care workers in the United States have at last focused on the need to do more about pain control. While medication is often used to alleviate physical discomfort, more and more people are turning to alternative approaches. Methods including, acupuncture, massage, holistic remedies and now TAP™.

“The system is designed to heal itself,” says Dr. Raymond Petras, the man who created the TAP™ approach. Dr. Wells, director of a chronic pain practice in Scottsdale, invited Dr. Petras to join her and her group which has also worked with many local, elite and professional athletes including members of the NBA, Phoenix Suns.

Petras, who has a Ph.D. in Psychology, works hand in hand with medical doctors and their patients. He utilizes a combination of techniques and conversation to calm the mind which allows the person to heal quickly, safely.

That TAP™ is so simple makes its success rate all the more fantastic.

“My contention is that if it’s OK for the pain to go away, it will,” Petras explained. “The mind works with the body to protect it... the function of pain is to tell you have a problem. So once you know that, you, theoretically, don’t need it anymore.”

TAP™ Works... Wonders!
